Question #1

You have many years of experience doing equity and social justice education, how do you see the progress particularly in teacher education?

Answer:

First, let me congratulate on the Journal. Thank you for the opportunity to share some thoughts and ideas on equity and social justice education. I have been engaged in social justice education I would say from I was a child growing up in Jamaica and seeing my grandmother engage with community members and her strong desire to support those who in her words “were less fortunate”. I have been an educator for 30 years in K-12 and higher education. My entire career has been dedicated to supporting students, challenging all forms of inequities in practices and policies in K-12 and higher education.

As you know I was a classroom teacher and teacher educator. There has been progress made in teacher education in many countries as teacher education programs have embedded courses focused on equity and social justice and supporting teacher candidates in translating theory to practice in their pedagogy, curriculum, and teaching and learning spaces. Equity and social justice is about student success, and not something additive. Notwithstanding, there is a far way to go as there are those that would like to keep the status quo that does not serve all students well remain in place. Practices and policies grounded coloniality and white supremacy logic are still in education and must named and dismantled so that all students can thrive.

Lopez, A.

Question #2

What do you think as major issues dealing with equity education in schools or institutions of higher education?

Answer:

Creating structural, long lasting change is never easy. Some of the issues embedding equity education in schools and institutions include some seeing the equity education as additive. That is on top of their everyday work instead of being part of their work and an integral and necessary part of student success. Lack of resources to provide the necessary support to educators can also be challenging, as well as educational leaders in schools and higher education who do not support equity education and make it challenging for those educators who are using their agency to create change. Another issue that can be challenging for some is ways to connect theory to practice in their everyday work and contexts. Sometimes this requires additional resources and practice. Educators need to be supported in their efforts. And of course dealing with resistance from those who do not want change, and support white supremacy logic that gives power to some and marginalizes others.

Question #3

In the past few years there seems to be more emphasis on equity, diversity, and inclusion in universities (particularly related to their hiring practices). Is that working or going to work from your perspective?

Answer:

In recent years EDI initiatives have gained support as organizations recognize the need for greater diversity and representation. So while EDI can be an entry point towards greater inclusion, I raise some caution. There cannot be representation without power. That is change in faces at the table, but no change in policies or practices. EDI without change in policies and practices within organizations are performative. There must also be intentionality in naming forms of oppression and committing to action to dislodge. EDI efforts also require accountability. By that I mean who is responsible to ensuring diverse people who are brought into spaces are mentored, given the resources to succeed, and who is responsible to ensure the change in policies occur. So, EDI should initiatives must be accompanied by meaningful change in universities in leadership, policies, practices and student, staff and faculty must be able to see and experience the change.
